Keyi Ble (The Wheat Pickers) by Chantal Paret Antoine
“If you are of a country, if you are born there, then you have it in your eyes, your skin, your hands, with the hair of its trees, the flesh of its soil, the bones of its stones, the blood of its rivers, its sky, its taste, its men and women...”

— Jacques Roumain (Haitian Author)
Haitian art has been traditionally divided into two distinctive genres: Naïve (Primitives) and The Moderns. Naïve (Primitives) is derived from folk art traditions, and the artists typically do not have formal training - resulting in an artistic innocence and independence from academic tradition. The subjects are depicted in the traditional forms of Vaudou, simple village and market scenes, rendered in vivid colors. Other scenes include detailed historic settings, the lush jungle, and religious depictions of paradise.

Conversely, The Moderns are schooled artists who have examined and integrated aspects of various international painting styles, particularly the French art tradition. The Moderns often feature similar subjects of Haitian art as the Naïve, including landscapes, history and current events, and various aspects of Haitian culture. However, the Moderns also draw inspiration from renowned styles such as surrealism, pointillism, expressionism, impressionism and abstract art.

The Primitive or Naïve genre of Haitian artists are influenced by their sense of place, creating schools of painters from these distinct regions in Haiti— the Artibonite Valley, the Southeastern coastal city of Jacmel, the Northern city of Cap-Haitien, and the mountain home of Saint Soleil.

The Artibonite style commonly depicts scenes of country life. These artists originally used distinctively colored and detailed images on a black background to emphasize their colors. Often they depict themes of fantasy, politics and human relationships.

Jacmel introduced the “School of Beauty” in which skilled artists create delicate paintings based on their reverential love of the beauty of nature and of women. They dream of perfection in their fantastical landscapes, inhabited by beautiful women in romantic scenes.

Cap-Haitien artists started their own school of art after following the footsteps of the Haitian Master, Philome Obin. This school of art is characterized by refined linear elements, meticulous paint handling, and subject matter that encompasses both daily life and the area’s rich history.

The Saint-Soleil artists banded together as part of a cooperative to represent the style with intricate patterns with saturated color. This school began much later, in 1978, and although the group disband, artists continued to pursue the work and to inspire future adopters of this genre.
The Moderns School of Art

The Moderns school represents various styles, and has emerged as a new tradition in which artists master the rules of art and painting to present a modernist interpretation. The Moderns are not categorized by a sense of place as the naïve painters, but by artistic styles that are recognized internationally. The past political climate of Haiti has also brought a more realist aspect of historical painting, and often depicts the realities of Haitian life, including the immigration of Haitians by boats and the devastation of the 2010 earthquake. The renowned Haitian-Puerto Rican artist Jean-Michel Basquiat has also inspired a new wave of Haitian art. His art includes abstract collage visual art depicting scenes not just of Haiti, but of the new lives of American-born first generation artists.
